

Being able to take part in conversations about your own health and express your wishes at the end of life isn't a luxury, it's a basic human right.

Did you know speech-language pathologists (S-LPs) and audiologists can help with that?

Hearing and communication challenges can create barriers at the end of life, making it harder to connect with loved ones, engage in care decisions, and share final wishes. S-LPs and audiologists provide critical support - helping patients communicate effectively, hear important conversations, and maintain dignity and comfort in their final days.

Make an S-LP or audiologist part of your care team today.
